THAT SWORD STORY.

It does not seem, to be absolutely stiled that the itory of the gift of a sword to General Washingt on by Fredsword to General Washington by Frederick the Great of Prussia is a myth. Mr Moncure D. Conway, whose letter to the New York Sun we recently queted, declared the legend to be unfounded and cit of Carlyle in support of that, belief. Certainly no absolute proof of the truth of the atory has ever been for the coming.

State Librarian W. W. Scott, writting to the Richmond Dispaten, is to ing to the Richmond Dispatch, is to clined to agree with Mr. Conway w to tegard to the swor', though "Col. Lewis Washington, in his sworn t sti-mony before the Sanate committee that investigated the Harper's Ferry outrage (of which James M. Mason, of Virginia, was chairman, and Jefferson Davis and J. R. Doolittle were of the members), says did notify that the sword was a gift from Frederick to Washington. He says nothing of the One thing has been demonstrated beyond question, we think, and that is that if Frederick the Great ever gave Washington a sword (which is very doubt'ul), the Prussian monarch did not have engraved upon the weapon the romantic sentiment, "From the oldest general in the world to the greatest." A New York Senath docu-ment, quoted by Mr. Verplanck, Col-vin, has communication to the New York Sangle ever as a coming the sword York Sun, says co coming the sword under discussion: "There is no known record of the fact, but it was generally reported in the family, that this sword wes brought over from Europa about the year 1780 to Washington, with the verbal message from Frederick II. (the Great), King of Prussia; 'From the oldert General of the world to the greatist'.' This is entirely too slendgreatest This is entirely too elender a thread to hold our faith.

Librarian Soutt sharply disagrees with Mr. Conway as to the connection between John Brown and the sword. Having made some interesting intro ductory remarks about the Frederickthe-Great tradition Mr. Scot: continues:

"I write, however, to express sur-prise at some of the statem atts of Mr. Moncure D. Conway copied in your is sue of this morning from the New York Sun: One, that Colonel Lewis Washington testified 'that Brown said he wished to get hold of this sword,' because it had been used by two successful generals; the other, that 'John Brown wasted the greater part of the only day in which he and his men migit have escaped by detaching six of them to get that dress sword-pre-sumably never worn on any battlefield. Seventeen lives were sacrificed to a mere myth. And then Mr. Conway refers to it as 'one more illustra-tion of the part played by fables in waking hi tory as well as recording it, thus digging a pit and failing into it.

"I have Colonel Washington's testimony before me as I wr.t. He said no such thing as Mr. Conway imputes to him, nor anything like it. He did say that Brown said he 'wanted Colonel Washington particularly for the moral effect it would give his cause, having one of his name as a prisoner.'

'Now, as to the second statement These six men went to capture Colonel Washington. The taking of the sword and the Lafavette pistol was an after thought. The 'detaching of them late Sunday night' in nowise weakened Brown's force, for he was in full possession of the arsensl, and Cook, Stevens, and the other four men returned be-fore day Monday morning, bringing supposed reinforcements of men, and equipments with them. At that time thing his own way.

"Mr. Conway would do well to reread Colonel Washington's testimony, and thus avoid the stumbling blocks of fables in his 'history.'"
